

The fast and efficient way to mitigate debtor-related risk

Like cracks in a dam, unperfected liens in your portfolio have the potential to become a big problem. At any time, up to 6 percent of the liens in your portfolio could be unperfected. With an average loan amount of $481 million, that could represent up to $29 million in unprotected assets. It's a level of risk lenders can't afford to take.

Changes increase risk

Over the life of a loan, a debtor's information may change in various ways. In some cases, their name and other corporate information may change. In other cases, their status with the state of incorporation may change for the worse. Also, UCCs may not be filed in the proper jurisdiction, or the debtor name may not be stated exactly as required in the corporate charter. While lenders understand the importance of making these updates, cleaning up your portfolio can be put on the back burner or take up valuable resources. But time only compounds your risk.

Tracking and updating debtors' changes is a challenge

You have more than enough to do managing day-to-day operations, but if updates to your liens aren't made, there can be expensive consequences.

| Change | Risk |
|---------------------------------------|--|
| Debtor name change | Financing statement will only be effective for collateral acquired before the name change and for four months after. |
| Entity status change | Potentially lose the recoverability of the loan. |
| UCC not filed in correct jurisdiction | Financing statement is not effective. |

You may not have the resources to monitor debtor changes and update your liens efficiently. With the clock ticking and risk rising, can you handle the additional workload to monitor and address changes across your entire portfolio?
